Clinicopathological analysis of the effects of nitric oxide production on tumour progression. Nitric oxide (NO) plays a role in various biological processes such as vasodilatation and tissue injury, and it is also involved in tumour growth and progression. Here we describe the NO-mediated mechanisms by which tumour cells interact with other cells of the microenvironment during cancer growth, invasion, and metastasis. Activated macrophages, endothelial and pericyte cells release NO as a defense mechanism against pathogens. The physiological sources of NO are chiefly neuronal or non-neuronal NO synthases (NOS) and the inducible isoforms (iNOS). In the presence of endothelial NOS, NO produced by endothelial cells plays an important role in the survival of tumour cells and in regulating endothelial transmigration of tumour cells. NO produced by tumour cells induces apoptosis of tumour cells, thereby restricting tumour cell invasion and metastasis. In addition to tumour cells, NO produced by tumour-associated macrophages (TAM) may also influence tumour growth and angiogenesis. As a local and systemic effector of immunity, NO is involved in adaptive as well as innate immunity. Furthermore, NO produced by immune cells may promote tumour growth and progression by various mechanisms such as tumour-associated macrophage infiltration, angiogenesis, and the suppression of anti-tumour immunity. In addition to these non-specific mechanisms, NO produced by tumour cells also enhances tumour growth via mechanisms such as apoptosis resistance and autocrine stimulation of tumour cell proliferation. In this review, we describe the biological actions of NO in tumour growth and progression and the mechanisms by which NO affects these actions. in-place distillation refinement.
